Teachers ought not to shirk from completing the syllabus and elucidating the concepts in the name of facilitating interaction. Although an interactive pedagogical method enriches the learning process, placing too much emphasis on active participation of students in the class at the cost of actual teaching, is, I believe counterproductive. 2. There should be a uniform pattern of examinations for all subjects. Although flexibility and a higher degree of discretion of the teacher are beneficial to some extent, arbitrary selection of modes of evaluation depending on the whims of the teachers, is not the right thing to adopt. 3. Workload of students should be decreased. Homogeneous projects, assignments, preparation before class and finally exams are all too much to handle simultaneously for students. Instead of adding in their growth, excessive work engenders feelings of frustration and anxiety and negatively impacts mental health. Leisure is an essential element for the blossoming of creativity and originality.

All of them address a long monologue. Some of them even read the various provisions from bare act without explaining them. Students know how to read bare provisions but teachers insist on reading law instead of understanding law. 2) The mentorship programme should be active. The mentors should reach out to junior students and help them understand and make the most out of law school. This will enable students to inculcate soft skills, life skills and help in holistic development. 3) Teaching in colleges are very different from teaching in schools. The institution needs to understand and adapt to the growing needs of the students (be it intellectual, emotional or infrastructural support). Please ask the teachers to really invest in their teaching or else please don't take up teaching as your job.
